President’s Message

I am writing this column on June 8, 1996, one month after the San Antonio AFCC Conference “Best Interest: Special Issues for Children & Families” and one week after June 1, 1996, the National Day of Commitment to the Children, sponsored by the Children’s Defense Fund.

- Since June 1, an 11 year old girl has been arrested for killing her two and half year old foster sibling. Investigations indicate a history of concern about the care of the children in the home.

- Since June 1, a civil rights group has announced the intention of going armed to the next Dallas School Board meeting where its members feel, arguably, that they have been badly mistreated in the past. As long as they are licensed to carry a gun and don’t threaten (!? with their weapons, they have the right to carry unlicensed weapons into the meeting.

- Since June 1, in Texas as in the rest of the nation, research reported that the number of working poor children continues to rise.

- Since June 1, two little boys ages 5 and 7, in a privileged suburban neighborhood, were stabbed to death and their mother injured in their family room of their house where they had fallen asleep watching television. The mother has now been charged in the death of the boys.

- Since June 1, a young father of three pre-school daughters was killed trying to intervene in a domestic dispute that erupted in the family restaurant he managed.

- Since June 1, 432 divorces have been granted in Dallas County.

- Since June 1, a Houston record producer has been imprisoned for sexual assault of three children.

Somehow these grim events can’t be offset by the stories of a young woman being awarded a $20,000 college scholarship, the mayor’s family hosting a family day picnic at the local zoo, or a graduate following her mother’s footsteps as valedictorian of the same high school a generation later.

These headlines are just the bad news from Texas. You are sure to have your own list. It hasn’t been a week that stands as a good example of commitment to children.

I am proud to associate with people who not only give lip service to addressing concerns about children but take innovative action. AFCC members are always sources of new ideas for making a difference in the court systems and in the lives of families.

Most of us join AFCC eager to find kindred spirits with whom to share altruistic dreams. Probably everyone who comes to the presidency of AFCC comes with goals around these kinds of dreams. I have two such goals that I am confident you share. This is just my opportunity to make them priorities. These goals are:

1. Highlight and reinforce AFCC’s inherent concern about children. AFCC could be to “best interest of children” what the National Forest Service is to Smokey the Bear. Smokey the Bear and his message are better known than the National Forest Service. Best interest needs to be the concern of everyone and AFCC is the ideal carrier of that message.

Looking ahead, we have the Boy Northeast Regional Conference, “Face-Up to the Complexities of Family Violence: No Simple Solutions,” and the San Francisco 1997 Annual AFCC Conference in association with the Second World Congress on Family Law and the Rights of Children and Youth. Both programs go to the heart of these concerns.

2. AFCC is proud of our professional diversity but our personal diversity is substantially more limited than the general population. A Diversity Task Force is being developed.

Join us in Boston and in San Francisco and take part in the “Best Interest Crusade.”
MEMBER PROFILE:
AFCC President Linda Hahn

Throughout the last year, AFCC President Linda Hahn just may have been the most recognizable person at AFCC conferences. As an association officer and a frequent presenter Linda has always been highly visible. However, in the past year she donned her bright red "San Antonio" T-shirt and toted a piafita to Montreal, Clearwater Beach and Stevenson, Washington and became a walking, talking billboard for AFCC's 1996 Annual Conference in San Antonio.

As Conference Chair, Linda provided far more than T-shirts and piafita. She supervised program development, recruited an outstanding group of local volunteers (see related story on page 6) and facilitated the planning of activities, entertainment and decorations. Although she is quick to recognize the contributions of others, Linda also notes, "All I've done for the last year is work at my new job and work for AFCC." This level of energy, skill and perseverance comes as no surprise to those who have worked with her.

Linda was born in Centralia, Illinois and grew up in a variety of small midwestern towns. "My dad worked for the railroad and we moved to a new town somewhere on the Mississippi River about every three years," said Linda. "I attended four elementary schools, two high schools and three colleges in four states before meeting her husband, Larry, during graduate school at Purdue. Larry and Linda were married and honeymooned on the way to Dallas where they have remained ever since.

After working at home until her children were in kindergarten, Linda returned to Texas Woman's University to complete her graduate degree in Human Development. She then began working at Dallas County Family Court Services. After nine years as a Family Court Services Counselor, Linda was promoted to Director of the agency, a position she held until becoming the Dallas County District Court Administrator in 1995.

"I loved working for Family Court Services because I am curious about people and interested in their stories," said Linda. "If you like to hear stories, it's about the most interesting work in the world."

Linda's new position as Court Administrator is a challenging one and she finds her mediation skills helpful. "What I do is completely out of the field and I wasn't sure that it would be meaningful for me," she said.

"But I love the new job. The other day I got an e-mail from one of our judges telling me that I was a peacemaker. I realized that I am taking the same skills I used with Family Court Services and applying them on a different level."

Compared to her mobile childhood, Linda's adult life has been a model of stability. She has lived in one city, worked for one employer, participated for several years in professional organizations and has been married more than thirty years. Linda has been active in many professional organizations and AFCC has been fortunate to be at the top of her list. A member of the Board of Directors since 1987, Linda has served as Treasurer, Vice President, twice as Conference Chair and in other capacities too numerous to note.

"I loved coming to my first AFCC conference in 1987 and I haven't missed one since. I always learn things that help me do my job better. The network that I have established has enabled me to call people all over the country to provide me with a new direction or solution to my problem."

Linda and Larry's children are now beginning their own professional careers. Lance just completed post-doctoral work in neuropsychophysics. He and his wife will both join the faculty of the Pennsylvania State University psychology department this fall. Kristin, who married an attorney, graduated from the University of Texas Medical School this spring and will begin her residency in Dallas this summer.

When she is not working for Dallas County or AFCC, Linda enjoys vacationing on the beach or in the mountains, cooking for friends and keeping something blooming in the yard. Although she hopes to have a bit more time for her leisure pursuits now that the Annual Conference is over, Linda realizes that her agenda as AFCC President will keep her busy. "My goal is to help us focus on children. We got off to a good start with San Antonio and the World Congress in San Francisco will help AFCC advance that goal." Linda also wants AFCC to work on diversity issues and has appointed a Diversity Task Force for this purpose. "We take a great deal of pride in our professional diversity at AFCC," she said. "We also need to look at cultural and other issues of diversity. A more diverse membership produces a better organization."

Mediation and Domestic Abuse: A Research Report

by Jessica Pearson, Ph.D.,
Director, Center for Policy Research, Denver, CO

Perhaps no other topic is as controversial as mediation and domestic violence. In recent years, at least 16 states have passed legislation exempting battered women from mediation; there have been many convenings of mediators and women's advocates to explore ways to make mediation safer; professional organizations have generated guidelines and standards that address mediation practice in cases with domestic violence; and training in domestic violence has become a standard feature of education programs for mediators.

A recent study conducted by the Center for Policy Research, with the support of the National Institute of Justice, examined how court-based divorce mediation programs handle the issue of domestic violence in their caseloads. We collected information using several methods including:

- A survey of 136 administrators of court-based divorce mediation programs to uncover official policies and procedures for identifying and handling domestic violence;
- Telephone interviews with thirty administrators of court-based, divorce mediation programs to discuss how the official procedures and policies are being implemented in day-to-day practice;
- In-depth study of practices in domestic violence cases using observations and in-depth interviews in mandatory court mediation programs in Orange County, California; Tucson, Arizona; Chicago, Illinois; Middletown and Litchfield, Connecticut; and Portland, Maine.

RESEARCH FINDINGS

1. Domestic violence is common in divorce mediation but varies greatly from case to case. Although rates of domestic violence are estimated to be in excess of 50 percent, only some types of cases are believed to translate into an inability to communicate equally. For this reason, mediators regard a history of domestic violence in and of itself as an unreliable indicator of power imbalance or incapacity to mediate.

2. Mediator attitudes toward domestic violence have changed. Most programs have altered their procedures to enhance the safety of victims during and after mediation.

   While mediators used to resist the idea of separate mediation sessions or private screening and caucusing because it might compromise their neutrality, most mediators now see these techniques as indispensable in domestic violence cases. Seventy percent of surveyed program directors report that staff mediators attend regular training on domestic violence; only six percent report making no use of special techniques to address the problem of domestic violence. The techniques used most often include:

   - on-site metal detectors, security guards and escort services to parking structures;
   - written intake forms, in-person interviews, shuttle or separate mediation sessions, male-female co-mediation teams, separate waiting rooms and separate orientation sessions for men and women with a history of domestic violence;
   - attendance by victim advocates, attorneys and other support people;
   - negotiation of detailed safety plans including neutral exchange sites and supervised visitation;
   - termination of mediation by the mediator and referrals to shelters and counseling programs that specialize in domestic violence.

3. There is a need for multiple and individualistic methods for identifying domestic violence.

   Mediators use a combination of techniques to identify domestic violence: written questionnaires, review of restraining order activity, clinical observations and in-person interviews. The most favored approach is private, in-person screening where mediators interview clients about specific incidents of violent behavior and explore capacity to mediate as well as substance abuse and conflict issues. While 80 percent of programs report screening for domestic violence, only about half utilize separate, private interviews to question clients explicitly about violence.

4. Definitions of success in mediation are changing due to domestic violence.

   A lesser emphasis is placed on reaching agreements than was prior practice. When safety is an issue, mediators prefer to terminate mediation rather than burden clients with this decision. The mediator can alert the court by referring the couple for an emergency investigation or evaluation. It was also found that mediators are more lenient on no-shows in domestic violence cases and treat the individual screening session as satisfaction of the mandatory mediation requirement.

5. Communication between the mediation and advocacy communities has been helpful.

   Mediation programs generally enjoy more acceptance by advocates for victims of domestic violence when representatives of the mediation and advocacy communities have had direct contact. For example, it is helpful that several of Maine's contract mediators are also advocates for victims of domestic violence. In Connecticut, advocates and mediators work together at many court sites to conduct assessments of batterers and victims pursuant to the court's policy of contracting with battered women's shelters to provide victim advocacy services in the court. In Tucson and Orange County, mediators and advocates have collaborated to conduct programs on domestic violence in settings where contact is high, mediators and advocates appear to adopt pragmatic views about what works and what doesn't that are rooted in case experience rather than ideology or politics.

6. Reactions of various professional groups are generally favorable.

   Attorneys and judges typically support mandatory mediation interventions because they feel that mediators are better trained about domestic violence than most judicial officers who frequently rotate rapidly through domestic violence and divorce calendars. They worry that many domestic violence victims are often unable to effectively articulate their fears and concerns in a courtroom setting. Attorneys and judges interviewed believe that mediation affords victims more opportunity than a court hearing to design custody and visitation arrangements that enhance safety. They also believe that in the absence of mediation, the growing number of unrepresented victims will receive no help with developing safety plans and visitation arrangements. While some advocates for victims of domestic violence share these same views and favor mandatory mediation programs, others worry about the court imposing too many mediation or counseling hurdles on victims who need legal remedies. They also express the concern that mandatory mediation will dilute the message that domestic violence is a crime.

7. There is a need for community services and multiple forums of dispute resolution.

   With the rise of pro se filings and the ability of lawyers to solve many cases on their own using quasi-mediation techniques, court mediation programs report that they are seeing families with more serious problems and limited financial resources. There is a growing need for services that are frequently unavailable in a dispute resolution forum. These include affordable legal services, counseling for batterers and victims, substance abuse treatment, housing and job training resources, monitoring services to enforce counseling and treatment orders and supervised visitation programs. In the absence of these types of services,

Professor Desmond Ellis

York University
Toronto, Ontario

Professor Desmond Ellis has been researching violence and conflict resolution for nearly thirty years. Born in London, England, he grew up in India and England. After attending the University of Leicester, Professor Ellis received a scholarship to McMaster University in Hamilton, Ontario where he earned his M.A. in Sociology. He completed his Ph.D. at Washington University in St. Louis and, following six years on the faculty of the University of North Carolina, Dr. Ellis returned to Canada at York University in Toronto, where he serves as Chair of the Sociology Department. As founder and former director of York University's La Marsh Research Centre on Violence and Conflict Resolution, Professor Ellis has authored numerous articles and conducted several studies on violence, mediation, power imbalances and domestic abuse. His book, Mediating and Negotiating Marital Conflicts, will be published by Sage Publications this summer. Professor Ellis presented at the recent AFC Conference Annual Conference in San Antonio and will present his latest research on mediation and domestic abuse at AFC's Northeast Regional Conference, Facing Up to the Complexities of Family Violence: No Simple Solutions, in Boston, September 19-21, 1996. Professor Ellis lives in suburban Toronto and has two children. Her daughter Megan recently completed high school at the University of Windsor and practices corporate law in Toronto. His son Theo just completed high school and will attend the University of Toronto this fall.

AFC: How did you develop an interest in violence and conflict resolution?

Desmond Ellis: It began in graduate school where I studied children who could not stay in the school system because of their violent behavior. We created a primary school for these children where we tried to change their behavior without chemicals of any kind. Subsequently, when I was at the University of North Carolina, I was approached about working on the issue of violence in women's prisons. I then began to study violence against women in Native American communities. I began to examine the informal methods of conflict resolution used in the Native American communities as well as the manner in which police intervened in domestic violence matters in the majority community.

AFC: Is domestic abuse a growing phenomenon, or are we just now beginning to pay attention to something that has always been there?

DE: It has always been there, but it has increased and decreased at various times. Changes are associated with various structural and cultural factors. Initially, increases in domestic violence have been associated with challenges to male hegemony. More recently, however, separation — a significant challenge to male hegemony — is the most significant factor associated with decreases in violence. However, while an increasing rate of separation is associated with a decrease in the overall likelihood of assault, the risks of lethality increase.

AFC: Despite its widespread popularity, mediation has been criticized by feminist scholars, legal scholars, advocates for battered women, lawyers and social scientists. Why is mediation such a popular target?

DE: Mediation presumes the capacity of individuals to bargain as approximate equals. That represents a problem for a lot of people who argue that given existing structural inequalities it is impossible to redress the power imbalances that males and females bring with them to mediation. Therefore, the power imbalance will be represented in mediated agreements which will not be fair. But many who oppose mediation do so not because of what mediation is or does. Rather, it is because they prefer the law enforcement model which they believe provides specific and general deterrence. The problem is, I don’t think the law enforcement model works unless you are white, married and employed.

AFC: Some critics of mediation raise the concern that mediation is unfair and potentially dangerous for women. Your latest study seems to contradict that statement. Are these concerns unfounded?

DE: I would like to see evidence which demonstrates that mediation is dangerous and unfair. The study we conducted in the Hamilton courts compared mediation with lawyer assisted negotiations. We found that mediation makes a greater contribution towards decreasing post-processing physical violence than does lawyer negotiations. Also, females in the mediation sample were more successful than female clients with lawyers in obtaining the amount of child support they wanted. The results from the Hamilton study are relatively stable, so until someone else comes along with stable results that indicate otherwise, I’ll stick with my study as reliable evidence. Furthermore, none of the critics have pointed to mechanisms which work better and do a better job of deterring violence than mediation. Orders for protection don’t work, alternatives to mediation are overinflated and mediation is often misunderstood. It almost seems that some critics feel as though mediators are less interested in the welfare of people than others. Where do they get that idea?

AFC: What do mediators and lawyers do differently?

DE: One thing lawyers do that mediators don’t is have clients complete affidavits, which are a statistically significant predictor of emotional and other forms of abuse. Clients put everything that is rotten about one another in an affidavit and having that delivered is upsetting and provoking. This division sets the tone for hostile feelings. Some of the information may be untrue, but it still upsets people. Also, some lawyers in our study viewed abuse as a non-legal interfering factor. Mediators in our study seriously considered domestic violence and power imbalances. With lawyers, power imbalances are not eliminated, they are simply moved to another level because those with more resources have better lawyers.

Thank You

AFCC Finds Recipe for Success in San Antonio

Begin with a dash of that special brand of Texas hospitality. Mix with more than one hundred outstanding presenters. Stir in hundreds of dedicated family court professionals. Sprinkle in a pinch of San Antonio spirit. Add hot music and spicy food. Blend well in a large Riverwalk hotel. Allow one day to cool.
Serves 500.

If there is a recipe for a successful conference, AFCC may just have found it in San Antonio at AFCC’s 33rd Annual Conference, Best Interest: Special Issues for Children & Families. Conference Chair and AFCC President Linda Hahn showed AFCC members the best Texas has to offer by serving up six pre-conference institutes, four plenary sessions and 36 workshops over the course of the four day conference. Conference highlights included the General Session, Should I Stay or Should I Go? Dad’s Dilemma and the Best Interest of the Child. Wade Horn, Director, National Fatherhood Initiative and Charles Ballard, President and Founder, Institute for Responsible Fatherhood and Family Revitalization, provided AFCC members with stirring presentations on the important role of fathers. The Closing Session, Cultural Considerations in Family Court featuring Hon. Charles Gonzalez, Attorney Carolyn Wah and Sociologist Pamela Gailer, focused on the impact of culture, both ethnic and professional, on the participants in the court system.

Thursday’s Award Luncheon featured a welcome from Texas Attorney General Dan Morales and an address by Judge Wilson, Deputy Administrator of the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, U.S. Department of Justice. Friday’s banquet was highlighted by a surprise appearance of the Luna Linda Band, a Tejano band from Corpus Christi which had AFCC members literally dancing in the aisles.

River Run Gets AFCC Up Early

AFCC members ran, walked, jogged and limped the 5K course at AFCC’s River Run in San Antonio. The race raised more than $1,200 for the Second World Congress on Family Law and the Rights of Children and Youth. Each registrant received a colorful River Run T-shirt for their contribution.

As for the race, John Kydd, Immediate Past President, and Clarence Cramer, Chapter Committee Chair, tied for gold medal honors in the men’s division. John and Clarence agreed to share joint custody of the first and second place medals, exchanging them each year at a neutral site, the AFCC Annual Conference. Rosemary Vasquez of Oakland, CA was awarded sole custody of the gold medal in the women’s division.

Congratulations to everyone who participated and special thanks to Hon. Charles Gonzalez for contributing the race officials, equipment, T-shirts, awards and breakfast.

AFCC Thanks Texas Supporters

AFCC conferences receive tremendous volunteer support, most often from AFCC members. This was certainly the case at AFCC’s Annual Conference in San Antonio. AFCC gives special thanks to Gari Arreaga for the marvelous banquet decorations; to workshop shepherds Mike Arreaga, Karen Marvel, Sharon Leach, Dave Tincher, Cheryl Adelson, Delores Gonzalez, Bill Hill, Bill Kearns, Sandra Fulitz, Tom Marsh, Martha Rodriguez and Sylvia Esquivel; to hospitality suite hosts Kaye Fulks, Justin Ezazaha and Liz Weinert; and to Dallas County Family Court Services Director Pat Ross.

Special recognition and thanks go to Hon. Charles Gonzalez of San Antonio. Judge Gonzalez did just about everything possible to assist AFCC in preparing for the conference, including providing local mail lists, helping with local publicity, sponsoring the River Run, providing the River Run T-shirts and breakfast for the runners, arranging for the donation of the banquet entertainment and presenting at the conference closing session. The enthusiasm and energy of Judge Gonzalez and the conference volunteers helped set the tone for the conference. Many special thanks to each of you for your generosity and support.

Mediation and Domestic Abuse

...court orders and/or mediated agreements have a limited ability to make a difference in people's lives. There is also growing recognition that some high conflict and violent couples need court interventions other than those currently available. Among the recommended approaches are more intensive therapeutic/legal interventions that combine mediation with counseling, evaluation and longer-term therapy; arbitration, where trained and experienced mental health professionals assess issues and make binding decisions in disputes that involve children; and hybrids of evaluation and mediation where mental health professionals conduct assessments, make recommendations, and engage parents in decision-making.

8. There is a need for research with mediation clients.

At this point, the critique of divorce mediation remains largely theoretical, anecdotal and hortatory. Rarely do victims of domestic violence speak for themselves. The few empirical studies that have been conducted with victims and non-abused mediation clients find no differences in client satisfaction, rates of compliance or re-abuse. While the debate about safety and fairness in divorce mediation has clearly subsided, some questions will only be resolved with more explicit research with consumers.

For additional information about the Divorce Mediation and Domestic Violence Project, contact the Center for Policy Research, 1720 Emerson Street, Denver, Colorado 80218.

Jessica Pearson, Ph.D., Desmond Ellis, Ph.D., and Lorraine Martin, M.S.W. will conduct a workshop entitled Mediation and Domestic Abuse: The State of the Art at AFCC's Northeast Regional Conference September 19-21, 1996 in Boston, Massachusetts.
